Recruiting hasn't been easy for Central Intelligence Agency Field Representative Harry Russell.

About a year ago, Cornell University students staged a sit-in when he tried to recruit there.

Recently, students at Williams College completely prevented him from recruiting on the Williamstown, Mass., campus.

And yesterday his pre-arranged interviews with State University in Albany students were disrupted by a group of protestors who linked the CIA to Vietnam of "Big Brother" activities on campuses.

But Mr. Russell, who wasn't worried about the threatened demonstration before it happened, merely picked up his briefcase and moved his office for the day from Room 321 Education Building to Room 115 Education Building (the Placement Office), barred the door and continued the interviews.

Campus security guards were alerted — but not called — and the actual confrontation was over. The protestors, members of various campus groups including the Student Committee to End the War and the Students for a Democratic Society, continued picketing the building and handing out leaflets which called the CIA "subversive."

Said an administrator in the building, "The insolent arrogance of these kids is something to behold."

The demonstrators, some of whom had participated in other campus protests against military recruiters and in the Washington protest a week and a half ago, numbered 10 to 12.
